Iranian forces pursue retreating Kurds

Iranian forces are believed to have controlled all strategic areas in the western province of Kurdistan and the Kurdish north by now. Kurdish military commanders said in Tehran yesterday that, for the first time in the war, an Iranian unit was being prepared to lead a military campaign. The Kurdish army, which has been fighting the Iranians for more than a year, is reported to have been augmented by thousands of warriors from northern Iraq. The Kurds are said to be planning a major offensive against Iranian forces in the region. The Kurds are also said to have received significant military assistance from the Peshmerga forces in Iraqi Kurdistan.

Iranian military commanders in Tehran yesterday claimed to have captured several key towns and villages in the Kurdistan region. According to reports, the Iranian army has been fighting the Kurds for nearly a year. The Kurds, who are estimated to number around 10 million, are said to have been fighting for independence from Iran. The conflict has been characterized by frequent clashes, with both sides accusing the other of using heavy artillery and air power.

The Iranian government has been trying to negotiate a peace settlement with the Kurds, who have been fighting for independence for nearly a decade. The Kurds are a minority in Iran, and their demands for autonomy have been met with resistance by the government. The conflict has also had significant human costs, with thousands of Kurds and Iranians killed or wounded in the fighting.
