Some 40 million of Iran's eligible voters cast their votes in Iran's 10th presidential election.

Iran has issued a new stamp to commemorate the massive turnout in the country's 10th presidential election held on June 12, 2009.

The Leader of the Islamic Revolution Ayatollah Seyyed Ali Khamenei, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and senior Iranian officials attended a ceremony to unveil the new stamp on Thursday, Fars news agency reported.

Some 85 percent of Iran's eligible voters went to the polls in the latest presidential election.

During the ceremony, Iran's Minister of Communication and Information Technology, Mohammad Soleimani, said the Iranian nation's massive turnout was unparalleled in the world.

"The stamp will be the symbol of the Iranian nation's unity and their massive turnout in the presidential election," he added.

Samples of the stamp would be sent to the museums across the world, Soleimani noted, adding that 400,000 copies of the new stamp will be published over the next three months.
